RESEARCH INTERESTS

I study human resource management and industrial relations, with a focus on how workers and unions, employers, and institutional environments jointly shape employment relations. My research follows two broad lines of inquiry. First, I examine the causes of union decline and the consequences of collective employee voice. This work investigates how employer resistance to unions and salient labor disputes (e.g., the 1981 PATCO strike) shape workers' willingness and ability to organize, as well as how collective action (e.g., strikes) affects worker well-being. Second, I study workplace inclusion, focusing on how unions and other forms of collective representation can promote or constrain inclusion across gender, immigration status, and other social identities. Across these areas, my research considers implications for workers, unions, and managers, including how organizations respond to employee voice, manage workplace conflict, support worker well-being, and build inclusive employment relationships. Methodologically, I draw on insights from economics, sociology, psychology, and organizational theory to inform rigorous quantitative analysis.
